Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from The Government of the State of New York In the study of civics in our schools there is usually such strong emphasis laid on the National government that the student comes to think that the State government is of very little importance. This fact has led and is leading the public at large to regard the State as scarcely anything more than an administrative unit like the English county and the French department. Men of learning and prominence regard with equanimity the gradual encroachment of the National upon the State government. That men in general do not object to the increasing assumption of powers by the National government may be in part attributed to the training which they receive in the schools. Whether such assumption of power is good or bad is of course debatable. No one will deny, however, that it is contrary to the spirit of our institutions. The reduction of our States to mere divisions for administrative purposes was something never contemplated by the most ardent Federalists. With the hope of counteracting in a measure the present tendency to aggrandize the importance of the National government I have aimed to bring before the student the exceedingly important part which our State government plays in our daily life. Another object I have kept constantly in mind is to show the government in its actual working. For that reason at the end of each chapter are several paragraphs on actual conditions.
