The increased mortality from typhoid fever showed itself in the Borough of Brooklyn. The mortality from measles remained about the same, and the mortality from broncho pneumonia, which affects children mostly, and is often a concomitant of measles, also showed very little change. The effect of the diminished prevalence of influenza was most marked in the lessened mortality from lobar pneumonia, a disease chiefly affecting adults. The diminution of the mortality among infants under two years of age was very slight. while that between two and five years was considerable, due to diminished mortality from scarlet fever, whooping cough and diphtheria, causes affecting chiefly this age group. The greatest decrease in the mortality was evidenced at the age groups above twenty-five years of age, and can be attributed to the providential diminished prevalence of that uncontrollable factor of mortality, influenza. The number of births reported during the month was 11,975, against 12,057 in January, 1911, a decrease of 82; this falling off in absolute numbers occurred in the Boroughs of Brooklyn and Richmond, and is probably due to a return on the part of some few of the midwives and physicians to the carelessness and neglect in regard to forwarding reports which prevailed until the recent rigid enforcement of the law brought the offenders up with a round turn, and caused...
